Rats an article of Commerce. that a number of Parisian glove makers propose removing to New York for the purpose of availing themselves of the abundant supply of Rat skins, which are be established along the Western Rivers in hunting rats-if their skins could find a market at the quotations given. imagine the poor coons would be left in peace for a few seasons, if rat skins slould be found to exceed coon skins in price. We are glad to have our faith the economy of nature that all things discerning this heauty; and we are orthowere created for some useful purpose, should only be named with traps and gnus, to which, if in our power, we confirmed by learning that rats will grow the material for a good glove. The following article is from the Baltimore

As civilization advances human ingenuity is severely taxed to supply man's natural and artificial wants. Our grandfathers would have said that the destructive vermin which infest our cellars under the name of rats would be the last thing which could ever be turned to a useful purpose. Even the fine lady of the present day, who piques herself on her exquisitely fitting gloves, would give one of those little shrieks, which she thinks so sweetly feminine, if told that the thumb of her glove was made of ratskin, as more elastic yet tougher than kid. The nineteenth century, in fact sees rats elevated to an article of comexceed in delicacy even that of the beaver. A company exists in Paris on the prinbuy up all the rats of France. In Lon- only the cause of loss of life. number of the Lordon Quaterly Review makes these facts the text of a curious and interesting article on the habits of the rat, an animal heretofore considered unfit to be introduced into decent society but which, under the auspices of the Quarterly, makes quite a respectable

Nearly every portion of the habitable globe is infested with these vernin.— Hardly a vessel sails without carrying with it a colony, and thus even the Islands of the Pacific are supplied with they will come on deck, on rainy nights, to drink, and will even ascend the riggthe folds of the sails. When very thirsty they have been known to attack thes pirit casks, and get like wiser beings, beat their wifes when drunk. Sometimes the same ship: one occupying the stem mon thing to destroy five hundred in single East Indiaman on her arrival at Calcutta. Often, when water has been scarce on they voyage, the voluntarily desert the vessel the night after her casting ancher, generally passing to land, in single file, along the mooring-rope, though if this is impracticable, they do not hesimore delicate animal than the large brown rat, and approximates to the original English rat, which is not yet entirely extinct, though some naturalists have asserted the contrary. Few persons have an idea of the vast numbers of these vermin. The Quarterly says, "rats are to the earth what swallows are to the air, universally present." But, unlike their feathered rivals, we rarely see them, and hence are ignorant of the countless millions that burrow under our cellars, run up and down be tween our walls, haunt the sewers of great cities, and devastate the granaries of farmers. But it is about slaughter houses that they "most do congregate." At Montfaucon in France, the proprietor of a slaughter house had a walled enclosure, where, one night, he threw the carcasses of two or three horses, and than went quietly with his workmen, and stopped up all the holes, by which the rats had entered it, after which he went in, with these same workmen, each armed with a stick. The rats, thus entrapped, were slain by hundreds. In a single month he killed, 16 050 and 2,650 in one gight. It has been estimated that the month he killed, 16 050 and 2,650 in one night. It has been estimated that the progeny of a single pair of rats would amount in three years, to six hundred and fiftysix thousand, if the could all find food and escape the accidents that makes the mortality among them so great.—

Between the large brown rat and the smaller species there exists a mortal antipathy, if an equal number of each breed are put into a cage over night the bigger ones, if not hungry, will eat off the long delicate ears of the smaller, which they seem to consider a great luxury; but if half starved, nothing will be seen of the smaller species, except the tails and smaller species, except the tails and bones.

The rat, according to the Quarterly. has never received the credit of sagacity. which he deserves, although the phrase "as cunning as a fat" testilies to the popu-$5, Delivered to any Address. fable that a rat robs a hen's nest by lying on his back and holding the eggs be-tween his paws, while his companions pull him along. Rats have been seen, one on each side, leading blind or aged rats to water. A gentlemen once noticed FILEXIBLE SILK HATS that several rats ate at the trough with his hogs; so, one day, he kept the hogs back, after the trough was filled, intendwhen he was afraid to shoot, and this

The teeth of a rat are so formed and grow so fast, that if he does not gnaw inces becoming scarce in France, and from santly, and by this process wear them which most of the finest gloves are man-away at the point, they become enormous circular tusks. Rats have been killed which having lost a lower tooth, have had the correponding upper one grown into a complete circle, the point of which winding around, had passed through to the lip of the animal. The Quarterly insists that the rat is really a beantiful animal, especially when sitting on his haunches and licking his paws; but we confess that our prejudices prevent our

COFFEE .- An able medical writer says that very few persons, and but a small Full particulars to Wholesale dealers scales of number of medical men, know that Coffee is one of the most important antidotes to many deadly poisons, and to a great many ordinary drugs. This remarkable fact leads to serious consequences, many patients receiving the right remedies, but not being prohibited from taking coffee destroy the intended effects of their me dicine, become worse, and lead the physician to change the right treatment into a false, and perhaps unhappy one — while the simple knowledge of the above fact would have contributed to ameliorate their state and save them. But far more important is it to know that many fatal merce. In Europe the fur of the rat is results of many accidental, spontaneous by hatters, having been found to or criminal empoisonments could be stopped almost instantly by administering that simple antidote coffee, while the loss ciple of the Hudson's Bay Company, to of time in calling a physician, is often

Margaret C. Nye's parents, in Westfield, Mass., have received a letter describing a singular illness which has befallen their daughter. Her limbs are swollen, and the blood has settled in them till they are black; her finger-nails have the appearance of a dead person's; the gums have separated from the teeth. and between the teeth and gurus clotted blood is constantly ozzing into her mouth. She seems to be gradually undergoing a process of decomposition while life still inhabits her body.
